Scavenger hunts turns kids into adventurers

Glenview's history is woven seamlessly into the community.

And the Glenview Park District's Museum Quest is ready for a second summer of introducing children and their families to those different destinations around town — and some lucky adventurers could win a prize.

This year's museums include The Grove, Wagner Farm, Kent Fuller Air Station Prairie and the Kohl Children's Museum. Each spot has a different challenge in order to win a stamp. Booklet for participants to keep track of their stamps can be found at any of the four sites, or online at MQGlenview.com.

Judy Picicco, environmental education supervisor at the Glenview Park District, saw plenty of benefits to participating in this year's Museum Quest.

"I think it's a fun activity and they get to learn a little bit about each site," Picicco said. "[Children can] learn a little more about some of the sites that you don't always get to see when you visit."

Museum Quest saw hundreds of participants come through the Kent Fuller Air Station Prairie alone in its first year and Michele Fiore, who works with the Glenview Park District, expects even more success this year.

"We are thrilled to expand on a program that was a huge success last year," Fiore said. "Families have a great time exploring fun places right in their own backyard and now, the addition of Kohl Children's Museum gives them even more options."

In 2017, Museum Quest originally was going to be held only at Wagner Farm, but after collaborating with the Glenview Park District, Museum Quest became a much larger project that included other museums across Glenview.

Each site has its own theme for its challenge. The Kent Fuller Air Station Prairie has a plants-and-animals scavenger hunt, The Grove has a hunt for history, Wagner Farm shows the different aspects of the farm and the Kohl Children's Museum has an exploration of technology.
